You make the conclusions of science comprehensible even to the laity, showing where the details are leading to, and what is the way and aim. It almost seems to me that this mathematical-empirical method of investigation, when once it develops into a definite art, and no longer depends upon individual genius, may inaugurate a new, perhaps slow, but certain way to philosophy, which will at any rate define exactly the objective substratum of all knowledge, rendering its nature indubitably clear, and thus establishing the ego-doctrine of Fichte as the only possible mode of philosophical thought. In a letter written in September, to announce the birth of his son Richard, Helmholtz gratified his father by admitting that it had (as the latter surmised) been his intention in the lecture to give an empirical statement of Fichtes fundamental views of sense-perception, and expresses...
