Abstract of several articles contributed to the Church Journal (New York), between April 4, 1870, and June 15, 1870, in reference to the question of the omission of the Filioque. I can not join in commending the omission of the obnoxious Filioque in the recital of the Nicene Creed. Not an English Churchman present, says your correspondent, thought, even for a moment, that he was thereby compromising his Church or himself. Of this I have no doubt; and as little do I doubt that every English Churchman present and consenting to the omission, did compromise both himself and his Church, whatever he might think to the contrary. The words and the Son are as plainly part of the confession of faith in God the Holy Ghost, as the words of the same substance are part of the confession of faith in God the Son. Both are bound in the English Churchmans conscience by the same authority--the authority, namely, of the particular Church to which he belongs, and through which he is in union with the Church Catholic. I can not see that English or American Churchmen have any more right to omit the clause and the Son out of compliment to the Greek, than they have to say of like substance, out of compliment to the Arian, or to adore the Sacrament when occasion is given, out of compliment to the Romanist. The offenses differ in degree, but in kind they are the...
